After his former general manager, Terry Ryan, raised questions about Mauer's durability during the World Baseball Classic last month, Twins General Manager Terry Ryan said he's "as healthy as I've been in a long time." As for Revere, Ryan has hailed the 24-year-old as a natural-born hitter with the potential to be a "touch" more than the everyday left fielder the Twins were anticipating when he was signed to a Minor League deal in early November. The Twins remained coy on their relationship with Revere until reaching a deal with the outfield prospect in November, when he signed with the organization. Having retained the rights to sign him for another year, they are interested in maintaining a closer relationship with Revere, even as he continues to play in Class A. Mauer is doing everything he can to remain sound from the second baseman position. He missed a month's worth of games because of back spasms, but the second baseman said on Monday that he's feeling no different in his preparation than he has been. In his first season with the Twins, Mauer ranked third in the American League with a.343 batting average. "He's been a very steady, dependable player for the last four years, and it's continued," Twins manager Ron Gardenhire said. Gardenhire has noticed an increased volume of work for Mauer in recent games. The manager has made it a point to get the first baseman into games at first base, a position that has been occupied primarily by regulars such as Michael Cuddyer. f30f4ceada
