[Javascript required to view Flash movie, please turn it on and refresh this page] The Approximate Time Frame for this Game: Early 2009 I really wanted to make a game about disfigured characters, and I wanted to play it. I wanted it to be a game that I'd like to play and that people might like to play as well. And, I wanted to make a game that would get me away from all the other PC games that I love, like Tyranny and I Love Bees. Stuff that I Am Interested In/Aware of: Graphic Design/Animation/Sound Design/Game Design/Coding/Other Stuff That Comes Along with being a Freelance Designer When I did the work for the previous game (Disfigured), I had recently finished reading the graphic novel Endbringer by Brian K. Vaughan and Marcos Martin. I had been an avid comic book reader for quite some time, and I had been looking for a good graphic novel to read (along with the movie that was based on it). I had been digging the stuff that was being published at the time, and I had found the most recent issue of The Authority by Scott Snyder and Greg Capullo to be my favorite. I also liked what I was reading from Brian Vaughan, and I decided to wait to see what other thing he did before picking up anything else. I really liked the way that Brian Vaughn was doing things, and I saw that Endbringer was on the shelves at the time, and I bought it to see what he did next. I liked it, so I bought the sequel, Seven to Eternity. It was as good as I'd heard, so I was excited to buy the rest of the series. I heard about the other thing that Marcos Martin was writing while I was in the middle of reading Endbringer, so I decided to look for that. It was well written and it seemed like it was an interesting concept. I had also read some of Marcos Martin's art before, which had impressed me. The art was so surreal and strange and otherworldly. When I looked him up online I saw that he was writing as well, and it looked like he had a few graphic novels out. And it also looked like he was doing a lot of other stuff as well. But, I still hadn't really thought about what I was going to do for a game, other than I'd already made a few concepts of my own and wanted to use my artistic skills to come
