This is a pretty short video and its purpose is to show you the the new lipo's performance when making a quick jump. .In case you missed it, there was a press release from Microsoft that announced the Xbox One's next-generation Kinect sensor. The sensor will have better audio and video capabilities, can track up to nine people, and is more battery-efficient. The camera, however, is no longer just a camera. Instead, it's an "action camera" that "records everything you see and hear." This means that you'll be able to "create a virtual environment that's as lifelike and rich as your real-world experience." When you're in a virtual environment, the sensor also tracks how you move and gesture, so you can interact with objects. This is all part of what the Kinect will eventually be able to do: replace your PC with a console. What if you aren't playing games? What if you're just watching TV or browsing the internet? You might be able to interact with the TV and Kinect using voice commands. Or maybe Microsoft will make a Kinect-enabled set-top box that is more like a smartphone than a TV.In this issue, we've got a fantastic list of articles for you from the finest professionals in the business.
