There's one more piece of information that I should add. If you check out the dk.zip file it is the version you'll be getting instead of the.rar file. You'll need a crack to get it up and running. Functional mitogen-activated protein kinase signalling is mediated by small GTPase-specific inhibitors in human HaCaT keratinocytes. Mitogen-activated protein kinase (MAPK) cascades are critical for normal cellular function and are often deregulated in carcinogenesis. The activation of MAPKs is known to be controlled by guanine nucleotide-binding proteins (GTPases) of the Ras superfamily, and we have recently reported that these small GTPases are required for MAPK activation in the mouse epidermis. We now present evidence that the GTPase-specific inhibitor NSC23766, and forskolin, a non-specific activator of protein kinase A (PKA), inhibited the growth factor-induced activation of MAPKs in the human keratinocyte HaCaT line. This inhibition was comparable to that achieved with the inhibitor of p21ras

---

NSC632839 and, importantly, suppressed the expression of immediate early genes induced by the growth factors. These data provide evidence for the involvement of small GTPases in MAPK activation in human keratinocytes and raise the possibility that their action may be more widespread than previously appreciated.

Assessing Physical Activity and Sedentary Behaviors of Inner-City Children: The Buffalo Energizer Test. The Buffalo Energizer Test (BET) is a 2-item questionnaire

(questionnaire items 3 and 4) designed to measure daily physical activity and sedentary behaviors in children. This study examined the validity of the BET by comparing to self-report and accelerometry. Participants were 88 school-aged children (53 males; aged 9-15 years; means [M] = 12.21, SD = 1.69). Pediatric experts evaluated item validity and scored item difficulty and wording according to the Physical Activity Rating Scale for Children. Participants completed a 30-minute self-report physical activity questionnaire

---

(PAQ) and wore the accelerometer for 3 consecutive days. Bland-Altman plots were used to examine measurement agreement, and Pearson correlations to examine the relationships between the BET, PAQ, and accelerometry. Expert-score difficulty and item-wording scores were similar to those of the PAQ. The BET scores were strongly correlated with PA

A quick glance at the pages of our new 30-pg. tabloid, The Daily Show, which launches nationally today, is enough to make you think we have our act together. And there are plenty of props that lend credibility to our claim of regular satirical reporting in the tradition of Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite. There's a handmade felt replica of the stand-up desk; a vintage press conference backdrop; and an oversized mimeograph machine, complete with black rubber O-ring, used for mock-ups on a huge table. But as our 30th anniversary issue, and first in this tabloid form, proves, there is plenty more to this business than props. And the jokes are just as in-your-face as the one about "the days before the days of

CSI" and the one about the American "predators on the go." It was hard to start on this project without remembering how it all began, and who the wacky associates of then, host Jon Stewart, were. Some remained with him, some faded away, but all had a direct, hands-on role in the creation of what is one of America's most popular, most watched, most loved, and best-selling TV newsmagazines. Readers may remember the old tagline: "Not just entertainment, not just information, Comedy
