A brief overview and explanation of the terms: "Character", "Charity" and "Content". A Character: A Character is an account that you log into to play an application that is available for the purpose of consuming the services of a particular provider. You may subscribe to a Character for a free trial period. There is no cost to subscribe to a Character. For example, your Facebook Account is a Character. In the real world, it is difficult to separate social identities from other personal identities. In the virtual world, however, the "Character" model is the most appropriate approach to keeping personal identities separate from social identities. You do not need to purchase a license for one of the characters available with the application. Only one Character is required per user. Multiple Characters can be kept for an individual, but it is not necessary. Charities, for example, are the only real world example that immediately comes to mind. But even these are often not under the control of the individual who is making the contribution. In most cases, an organization or institution will have a formal policy in place to handle charitable contributions. In the virtual world, a website or app could handle charitable contributions. Content is the term used for a particular interaction with a particular service of the provider. For example, my Facebook friends could be "Content" with me. The actual app that I am playing on the phone, could be the "Content" I am "consuming". On one level, "Content" can be synonymous with "Subscription". However, on the next level, we use the term Content to describe individual events that a user has with a particular provider. For example, I would "subscribe" to receiving text messages on my phone from a friend. When I "consume" the service, the message is sent. This is a "Content" interaction.
