Should all submaximal CPETs for predicting PAH progression in repaired TOF be performed at maximum workload? Recent studies suggest that predicting pulmonary arterial hypertension (PAH) after repair of tetralogy of Fallot (TOF) with submaximal cardiopulmonary exercise testing (CPET) is feasible and is associated with a postoperative decrease in PVR. These studies were performed at maximum workload (WC) with arterial and mixed venous blood sampling, limiting the generalizability of the data. This study aimed to assess whether submaximal cardiopulmonary exercise testing (CPET) performed at 50% maximum workload (MW) is as predictive for PAH as submaximal CPET performed at WC. We hypothesized that submaximal CPET at 50% MW (SWCPET) would correlate with postoperative right ventricular (RV) function at rest and at exercise, correlate with postoperative PVR reduction, and be more predictive for PAH than submaximal CPET performed at WC (WCCPET). A prospective, nonrandomized cohort study. Single tertiary pediatric cardiac referral center. Twenty-six consecutive patients (median age, 13 months; weight, 12 kg; median PVR, 62.5% predicted) were studied with right heart catheterization, SWCPET, and WCCPET at 2 to 13 years after the initial correction of TOF. Submaximal CPET to maximal workload and maximal exercise testing were performed at rest and at 50% and 85% (n=24) of maximal workload (maximal exercise tests were not performed). At rest, SWCPET and WCCPET showed an inverse correlation between CI and mPAP (p

1. Field of the Invention This invention generally relates to a composition for preventing urogenital infection, and methods of its use. The compositions are useful in the treatment of urinary tract infections. Specifically, the compositions contain at least one of polymyxin B, colistin, or a mixture thereof, in an amount of 0.01% to 0.3% by weight of the composition, and the remaining portion of the composition comprising a nonionic quaternary ammonium compound. 2. Description of the Prior Art Urinary tract infections (UTIs) are the most common infectious disease of humans. UTIs can be caused by a variety of pathogens. Bacterial UTIs are characterized by frequent or chronic symptoms or long-term sequelae. For example, a number of organisms produce toxins that are active against the ureters and bladder. Often, the organisms that are responsible for causing the infections are E. coli, the most common organism in most UTIs. Acute uncomplicated UTIs are commonly caused by E. coli, Klebsiella spp., P. mirabilis, and Enterococci. E. coli accounts for more than 75% of UTIs in adult women. These infections of the urinary tract may be asymptomatic (no symptoms) or may include lower abdominal pain, bloating, dysuria, urgency, frequency, and suprapubic pain. UTIs are also known to cause cystitis (inflammation of the bladder). UTIs can also cause upper tract infections, which are characterized by fever, vomiting, and nausea. Various products are currently used to treat UTIs. Commonly used antibiotics include trimethoprim-sulfamethoxazole (TMP-SMX), ampicillin, amoxicillin, norfloxacin, and nitrofurantoin. These antibiotics have different mechanisms of actions. For example, beta-lactam antibiotics, such as ampicillin and amoxicillin, inhibit cell wall synthesis by binding to penicillin-binding proteins. The quinolone family of antibiotics, such as norfloxacin, inhibit DNA gyrase. The TMP-SMX combination is used to treat acute uncomplicated UTIs. The effectiveness of TMP-SMX as an antibiotic treatment for UTIs is not well established in the literature. However, several studies have been conducted. In one study, oral TMP-SMX was found to be effective
