componentsQ: What's the process behind this "formal" (?) seminar? What is the process behind this seminar (not a class)? The context is that we will have to defend an extended project to be put on later this semester. There will be around 30-50 students attending this seminar, and we are all from different groups in the same department.

Thus, it will be not a class, more a seminar, a series of informal discussions, where we all are trying to figure out what we are doing and what works or not. The point of this post is to understand if we can do the same approach in "class" (i.e., if we get the same results, as opposed to a seminar). A: It sounds like a class. It's a seminar except you invite some people to stay and listen for more than a period of time. Instead, they (or all of them) leave. The difference between the two concepts is how to qualify the participants. Seminars require that everyone coming in be someone who has something to contribute, either knowledge or interest. They just hang around and listen. Classes require that all the people involved know something. They generally have some kind of task in mind to accomplish. They might be actually attending the class, but more likely they are listening to it as something that they have a stake in. They might have a task to do, that's part of the reason they're there, and they're doing this class work as a way of learning what to do. They will be following along and taking notes, and perhaps showing their work and having their results critiqued. In neither case are the participants expected to come up with the answers. They are simply to ask questions and find out more. The benefit to a seminar is that it is easier for both the participants and the facilitator to do a couple things: Can participate without a specific stake in the outcome. Learn things and not just observe. A class is designed to show how something is done.
