Q: Would a university in the US have a procedure to remove a professor who beats and/or abuses his wife? For the purposes of this question, "beating" is including hitting, slapping, scaring, restraining, causing injury, assault, hitting with/without a weapon, etc. and it can be used against a spouse or someone else. It includes physical abuse and emotional abuse as well. From what I know, in the US, schools generally don't have any procedures to remove a professor from a position who is abusive. Instead, all the universities that I know of rely on the police to go after the professor in question. Is that correct, or is it that universities would go after a professor who abuses his wife or others? It makes sense to me that the school would likely not respond, but that doesn't mean they shouldn't. A woman being abused (or a child) doesn't have a right to do anything without a response, but that doesn't mean a response isn't appropriate.

A: In New York, there is a law (New York Civil Rights Law § 44-1) which says: For good cause shown, a court of competent jurisdiction may restrain a person or persons, either jointly, severally, or by any of them, from entering or remaining in a building or premises of another person or persons, including a school. For the purpose of this section, "good cause shown" means a showing of reasonable cause to believe that the person or persons apprehended has committed or is about to commit a misdemeanor as defined in section 120.00. The statute has a number of exceptions and one of them is for the disciplining of a teacher: Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, this subsection does not prohibit the disciplining of a teacher in an educational institution. So in New York, a court might order a school to remove a teacher if he/she is abusing his/her spouse. The catch is that the school may discipline a teacher for abusing his/her spouse, but it does not have to. So a court might say "go for it" even 09e8f5149f

It is a nice piece of software. No documentation. Just one button with this text, "Click any file to Convert". I used it for a week. This software did not let me down. I found it suitable for all FLV videos and all can be MP3s. I wanted the output to be a compatible format with a player (I had the Microsoft Media Player and Windows Media Player on my system). With the software, it comes to my desktop in a single zip file. With the MS Media Player or Windows Media Player, it comes in two parts (video and audio). I could convert video only with the software. So I had to install the software and then extract the video before playing it. For my earlier trials, I used the free version. It did the job. I used the paid version for more than a week. It can convert all formats (except HD format of course). I wanted MP3 format, but the software only has this option in Windows Media Player and is not compatible in all the other players (some are compatible) as well. The software does the following: You specify your file. The software scans your source file to see which formats it has. It shows you as an option, which one you want. It offers multiple formats (MP3, AAC, WEB-DL, OGG, WAV, etc.). It shows you the codecs it needs for each conversion format, including the duration of the video in different formats. It scans the file again to
