An atomic clock is a device that keeps a steady time, regardless of the number of working parts, so it is not affected by dust or humidity. It is a highly accurate time standard, which is based on a regular emission of microwave light, which carries time. In Chronos Atomic Clock Synchronizer, you may simply set your computer to connect to a server at a certain time interval, and/or set it to perform that function automatically when the program is run. The latter mode is useful when you are not sure whether the network will be available at the specified time. You can define the frequency of the synchronization, the particular server or list of servers to connect to, and the time interval between consecutive checks. The interval can range between 30 seconds and a day. The tool can also be configured to run automatically on startup, or you can schedule it manually at a specific time. You can test a server and edit its address, as well as disable or remove it. Furthermore, you can add new servers, and minimize the app to the system tray area. Chronos Atomic Clock Synchronizer will perform the synchronization automatically, with the simple click of a button.
