The present invention relates generally to an exhaust control system for a vehicle, such as a motorcycle. More specifically, the present invention relates to an exhaust control system having a silencer having a baffle. In general, vehicles such as motorcycles include an engine having an air induction system and an exhaust system. Typically, the engine has intake ports through which air is drawn for combustion, and exhaust ports through which exhaust gas exits the engine for emission control. The exhaust system may include an exhaust pipe (i.e., a tailpipe) connected to the exhaust ports of the engine, and a silencer connected to the exhaust pipe. Due to emissions requirements, exhaust control systems have been developed to reduce levels of emissions of hydrocarbons, carbon monoxide, nitric oxide, and other undesirable exhaust gas components. Many of these exhaust control systems are capable of providing high levels of emission reduction. Many exhaust control systems include a silencer having a baffle to help direct exhaust gas flow. The silencer may have a discharge end (i.e., an opening in the silencer) that vents exhaust gas flow. In general, it is desirable that exhaust gas not exit the silencer until it is in contact with cooler atmospheric air. When exhaust gas flows from the silencer, the air passing therethrough helps to cool the exhaust gas. To reduce emission levels, exhaust control systems may include engine brakes that redirect exhaust gas flow to the exhaust system, or away from the silencer. In general, engine brakes are passive components that redirect flow of engine exhaust gas either to the exhaust system, or away from the silencer. Engine brakes are placed within the engine's exhaust system to assist in engine braking. Typically, a motorcycle includes two exhaust control systems, an engine brake, and a muffler. The engine brake is used during a de
