Google's satellite-based mapping technology, often referred to as "Bing Maps", uses aerial photographs that have been collected from aircraft and compiled by Google in order to show users on their computer the geography of the world. Aerial photos are scanned to convert them into satellite images, which are then used to produce the high-resolution imagery for Google's mapping service. # of Small Cells on Earth As of September 2011, the number of small cells installed on Earth is approximately 4 million, most of which are in the USA, Europe, and China, and nearly two-thirds are in the USA. When compared to the number of cell towers, cell density is actually higher. Key Issues &

---

What to Do The above outline provides the concepts necessary to understand the need for and potential of small cells.

However, in most countries where small cells have yet to be deployed, legislation, business and regulatory frameworks, and other factors can make the adoption of small cells difficult.

Key issues can include:

Business case. The overall cost and effort required to design, deploy, operate, and maintain the wireless network is higher than that of the legacy network, making the business case to deploy and maintain small cells a difficult one. Cost of deployment. Deploying small cells requires far more resources (e.g., manpower, equipment, materials, and labor) than deployment of a traditional wireless network. The additional deployment and maintenance costs can lead to higher per-unit business expenses. Challenges associated with deploying and maintaining a small cell. For one, there is a challenge with finding a suitable location to install a small cell, especially for the urban environment. In order to minimize the impact on the area, finding the best location is crucial. For example, the best location to install a small cell can be based on the following factors: GPS service. The location of small cell may need to depend on the location of the GPS. That is, if the GPS is used to provide location information for a smartphone, then the location of the small cell should be near to the GPS. Capacity of location-based service. A location-based service (LBS) is often deployed to provide location information for the mobile users. Thus, the location of a small cell also needs to be near to the LBS. Degradation in LBS quality. The quality of the LBS is directly related to the availability of the LBS.

Therefore, the location of the small cell
