There's a lot going on in Western Canada right now. The global economy is struggling. Interest rates are at historic lows. Confidence is at a five-year low. A pending trade war with the US is threatening business as usual in the agriculture sector. What does it mean for Prairie farmers? University of Calgary economist Trevor Tombe says people have been quick to blame them for the global trade tensions, but they're not alone. "Those trade tensions certainly will affect us. What we've seen in the last year is that when that trade war started in earnest, the U.S. had slowed down exports significantly. Canada wasn't a beneficiary, but you saw the net impact on the Canadian economy — that was through exchange rates. When that slowed down, we saw exchange rates push higher. In the short term, that's going to hurt. You're going to see more of the Canadian dollar than Canadian exports because export goods are quite competitive internationally," he said. Market forces are strong. Economists say the problem is that the market is simply responding to stronger U.S. demand and slowing U.S. exports. There's also a lot at
