Steve Jobs' Cofounders Form New Apple-Compatible Hardware Company

Apple's Cofounders, Pixar's John and Steve Jobs, and the late Intel's Andy Grove, are cofounding a new Apple-compatible hardware company that will be taking on a tough market: wearable devices. In an interview with AllThingsD, John and

Steve Jobs' daughter, Lisa Brennan-Jobs, said her father's company, called the Bits team, will be developing hardware technologies for the consumer wearable industry. "What my father was doing for 20 years was turning innovation around," Brennan-Jobs said. "Fantastic designers, inventors, people who love to build and design hardware. We have that, but we also have the smartest people working on software, in areas like augmented reality and virtual reality," she said. The interview took place at the Sundance Film Festival in Utah, at the same time Sundance is holding its own hardware conference, Silicon Slopes. The conference shows that tech industry juggernauts like Apple, Intel,

---

Nvidia, and, yes, Pixar, are now entering into the hardware space. Intel forked over $16.7 billion to buy mobile chip startup Mobileye, and Microsoft recently offered to buy Nokia's mobile handset business for $7.2 billion. It's easy to see why Apple, Intel, and Mobileye are entering the hardware space. While the technology industry continues to sell more and more Apple products, the iPhone's success has been slowing. Apple's iPad tablet, while still popular, isn't the industry growth driver that it used to be. Apple needs to expand beyond just mobile devices and into new markets. The Bits team has only posted a few teaser images to Facebook, but it's possible they're only building prototypes. But it's clear that John and Steve Jobs are excited about the project, and it seems that in Silicon Valley, you're only as good as your last hardware product. #
