A trio of wide-eyed 14-year-old boys, fresh from the kitchen, tend to a long line of curds in a small shed at their local dairy farm. These lads look like any other 14-year-old student, from a small rural town in the South Island. But despite their age, the Rangitata boys Paul, Andy and Craig are used to leading the way. Kiwis know all too well the importance of getting our dairy consumption right. The average New Zealander drinks twice as much milk per capita as the average Kiwi; Kiwi kids are 20 kilograms lighter than our Australian, British and Australian counterparts; and the average New Zealander spends $700 more per year on dairy products than average. So our billion-dollar-plus dairy industry isn't going to be happy with the latest scandal that's hit our national press: someone has been turning milk powder into cocaine. A Chinese supplier of a component of milk powder has admitted to a batch of South Auckland Chinese restaurant owners that they were using a toxic chemical, which is reportedly used to make the drug, to make the milk powder. This is the second time in three years that an investigation into a New Zealand milk supplier has raised questions about the legitimacy of products. The World Anti-Doping Code sets out different levels of penalties for the various types of doping offences. The penalties range from, in the case of Olympic Games violations, expulsion from the Games and three-year suspension to warnings, fines, and time served on a year's probation. The code is designed to protect athletes from doping cheats
