Hyaluronan (HA) is a major glycosaminoglycan component of the extracellular matrices of mammalian tissues. It is known that HA is present on the surface of certain cells, such as human leukocytes. Leukocyte-derived HA is thought to be involved in the regulation of cell-cell interactions and leukocyte-endothelial cell interactions through the interaction with specific cell-surface receptor(s) which bind the HA-based moiety. The present study was undertaken to examine whether human leukocytes, like epithelial cells, have HA-binding protein(s) and to define the binding characteristics of the proteins.
