In the past, various different types of pressure control valves have been utilized to control the discharge of fluid from a pressurized fluid system. Most of these prior art valves, for example, as shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,934,462, utilized a valve body having a discharge port and a pair of annular valve seats which cooperate with one another. A plurality of valve plugs are positioned in the valve body and are adapted to be moved to various positions to selectively expose and close the discharge port. In these types of valves, it is necessary to provide a separate spring for each valve plug. In these valves, it is also necessary to provide a separate spring for each valve plug and in turn, an increased number of parts is required which results in increased manufacturing costs and in turn, increased overall costs. In addition, the design of these valves prevents the number of the spring members from being reduced. The State of the B2B Sales Person One of the reasons for B2B's perceived weakness is the lack of consistency in the sales process. As a result of the competitive nature of B2B sales, it is
