Occurrence of Fusarium spp. in the commercial production of common bean seeds in south-eastern Nigeria. Seed infection by Fusarium species is a major factor in common bean (Phaseolus vulgaris) seed production. This study evaluated the occurrence of Fusarium species in common bean seeds produced in south-eastern Nigeria. In total, 27 common bean seeds were collected from farms across seven districts in south-eastern Nigeria. Fusarium was isolated from the seeds using a selective isolation medium, and characterised based on colony morphology on potato dextrose agar (PDA), growth rate, colony texture on PDA and the Fusarium Germ Tube Test. The isolates were identified based on morphology and nucleotide sequence of the internal transcribed spacer region (ITS). Among 27 seed samples analysed, 23 were contaminated with Fusarium species, with a mean of 27.7 Fusarium-positive seeds per sample (range = 18-54 seeds). Mean germination rates were 83.9% (range = 70-100%) and 74.1% (range = 50-95%). Fusarium oxysporum was the most abundant species (n = 17). This species accounted for 88.2% of total isolates and was isolated from 23 (81.3%) seed samples. The Fusarium oxysporum f. sp. phaseoli was the only known Fusarium-related pathogen of common bean and was recovered from 12 (54.5%) of 23 seed samples. The members of the genus Fusarium were ubiquitous in Nigeria and contributed to the occurrence of seed mycosis, including seed decay and seedling blight in common bean. F. oxysporum f. sp. phaseoli caused a considerable loss in yield and economic losses. Control of F. oxysporum f. sp. phaseoli in this region of Nigeria is crucial. This study is the first report of F. oxysporum f. sp. phaseoli in Nigeria.

Plant-associated bacteria protect Brassica campestris from pathogenic infection. The beneficial effects of host plants on plant growth and health are best documented in associations with mycorrhizal fungi.
