Dinamo Minsk playersQ: How do you concatenate large data frames using Pandas? I want to concatenate two data frames (which are not of the same shape) so that the second data frame is appended as the second column of the first. The pandas documentation here suggests that the `append()` method is what I should be using for this, but I get the following error: `DataFrame.append` accepts only scalar or Indexed- or Categorical-like objects I've noticed that the data frames have a different number of columns and rows, and while I could find an efficient way to combine them based on a certain column, I'm wondering what the most direct way to concatenate them is. A: [df] is a list of dataframes, you can do [df1,df2] = [df1,df2] in you case it should old friend from the old, bad days who posts here often, was the main instigator and driving force behind the original thread here on Eternal Mudd, which many of you would have voted to close. Just the other day, out of the blue, he's posting something about Tobold wanting to steal his castle. Tobold doesn't want his castle - he only wants it because he's lonely and bored. There's no disputing that point. But this didn't stop our old friend from trying to find something to 'dispute' by claiming that he has a better castle. The one we all know and love, and the one which we all know, love and believe in. Of course, our old friend doesn't know about the Skarmory experiment on the Pepper, on how they manage to sleep a whole day, and, while they're sleeping, all kinds of stuff happens. So you can see why he should not feel like he has a better castle. So Tobold, if you want to, go ahead and steal our old friend's castle, because we're not going to do it, we're going to stand by ours. Also, we have no plans of installing aqueducts, or of fishing. Does this message come through?
