Increased vasoconstriction in myosin light chain kinase knockout mice. The present study examined whether knockout of the myosin light chain kinase (MLCK) gene alters vasoconstriction in response to different substances. Male knockout and wild-type mice were used. Transient intra-arterial infusions of noradrenaline (NA, 0.1-1 microg. min⁻¹), angiotensin II (All, 0.01-1 microg. min⁻¹), K(+) (125 mM)) or phenylephrine (PE, 10 microg. min⁻¹) were performed. In wild-type mice, NA and All increased blood pressure dose-dependently and K(+) and PE decreased blood pressure. In MLCK knockout mice, NA did not significantly alter blood pressure, whereas All elicited a pressor response. K(+) and PE also induced blood pressure increase in MLCK knockout mice, although these responses were significantly smaller than those in wild-type mice. The rank order of the extent of response to K(+) and PE between the two genotypes was not significantly different.

These findings indicate that MLCK may contribute to blood pressure regulation and the vasoconstrictor actions of K(+) and PE.
