AlsaDsp In sound cards it is very common to have a low level signal (known as AlsaDsp in ALSA terminology) used to power the entire card. This signal acts as an energy source for audio DSP and it is coupled to the input pin of the card. This is common in home machines and in some low budget industrial devices. It usually means that all data are lost if the machine shuts down, and cannot be shutdown. One solution is to connect this input pin to a spare output pin on the output side of the card. But as you can imagine, there will be some limitations to this approach. Another approach is to turn on the output of the card (the rear side, like A/D) and it will power the entire card. This will provide more reliable performance and will even let you turn the power off. My sound card had this feature and I've used it for years. More recently I discovered that it actually has an input filter on the output. As a result, the card has no output signal when it's powered off or when is powered on with the "spare" input. This does have an effect on the performance because we lose one way to access the outputs. However, I've found a way to access this pin in Linux: sudo alsa-tool --reconfigure It seems that the card has two outputs, one as usual, and one that is not accessible. I can't enable it with alsamixer, so I had to install the volume control to see it:Q: When did Archimedes' "Equilibrium" (i.e. proof of water displacement) first appear in the Western tradition? In his Commentary on Stobaeus's The Sun and its Effects (within De Motu Naturali), Archimedes notes that to "believe this is the same as if you throw a ball upward and let it fall; for it will descend until it has acquired the same speed, as that which it had in leaving your hand." (DN VIII.5.5) This seems to be a very early development, as the "ball" is defined in terms of a "geometric point" or "spot". And then in the next sentence, he shows that the ball has to reach the same speed, irrespective of whether the hand is moving. So, Archimedes is apparently the first to define the ball as "

However, according to a new study, your experience of pain during an epidural may be different than you think. The study by UC Davis researchers revealed that dogs are more sensitive to the pain of their owners than other humans. The study is published in the journal Pain. Researchers tested human and dog pain sensitivity by having 40 human and 40 dog subjects watch a video of a man being bludgeoned with a hammer, one of which subjects held a dog inside them. They also checked the level of pain of the other subject using an electronic pain meter, and the outcome
