If it's not a startups that you're building as an investor, a founder or acquired, you're probably looking at a larger organization, and it is the balance of the board, the management team and the time horizon that you're investing in. So if you can impress the management team, you will probably be able to achieve a good return. The reason startups are more difficult is because they're typically a very new organization. The management team will need a lot of time to adjust to your point of view and listen to you, and they will be talking to other investors and founders to understand what their goals are. Founders will be talking to their alumni to see if they should be splitting off teams, alignment is really going to be critical here. I would say that for a founder looking at exiting, which most founders do at some point in their career, most of them get frustrated that they're not being heard by the investor or the board, but they also think that they are in good hands, and so that's why they have a tendency to stick around. For an investor, it's harder to tell whether you are in good hands. An investor will have a group of analysts who are constantly monitoring your performance, and they will be working closely with you to make sure that you are meeting your milestones. If you're choosing not to exit, you'll usually have a team of analysts looking at your portfolio and calling you once in a while. An investor will typically try to find out more about your business and will try to understand your business, but an investor will not be working with you on your strategy unless you ask them. To recap, startups and larger organizations are equally difficult, but founders in large organizations will have a better shot than startups unless they have some major management challenges, and the question for the founders is how do you build a team that can get the job done. ------ jasonjei My startup

In Vista Beta 3, as explained below, there is a $$ 49.99 / c o p y$ version of the next version of Leopard, according to the MSDN Online documentation. I've been on the forums for 3 years and I never had any problems with either version until the new user interface and the finder, when it doesn't even work on my system, I am in the process of removing all files.
