Lightroom is for newbies who want a free, lightweight, intuitive alternative. It can be used even if you have no formal Photoshop experience. Lightroom will work with most of the features in Photoshop. What are the main differences between Photoshop and Lightroom? Photoshop is a professional image editor. It includes editing tools like Spot Healing, Spot Healing Brush, Clone Stitching, Clone Source, etc. Lightroom is free but not as full-featured. Lightroom won't let you edit RAW files or convert raw images into other file formats, but it can import most RAW images and edit them into JPEGs. Lightroom can import images from a camera and perform basic adjustments like brightness, contrast and hue. Photoshop includes more advanced features like exposure, color adjustments, background replacement and special editing tools. Lightroom doesn't include the advanced features like Liquify, selective adjustments, and the Paint Bucket tool. The Fill tool in Photoshop removes selected pixels and fills the space with the specified color. The Healing Brush finds pixels that are different from the surrounding pixels and uses them to automatically reposition the image or add pixels. The Pen tool allows you to draw, erase, and adjust paths, curves, and shapes with the click of a button. The curves include lines, circles, stars, squares, diamonds, and rectangles. Photoshop's Live Paint feature, available in Photoshop CS5, provides a raster (pixel-based) preview of the area you're working on. It blends colors, adds droplets of paint and paint effects, and removes paint, allowing you to continually and effortlessly see what you're doing. The Refine Edge tool creates a smoothed, polished look to edges in your image. It accomplishes this by using other tools and a few Photoshop actions (applied in different ways). The Gradient tool allows you to paint layer gradients with as many colors as you want. It also allows you to freely drag, rotate, and scale the gradient. The Eraser tool is an important tool for deleting and painting out selected areas in a photo. Its scope can be limited, but it can be used to gently erase large portions of an image. The Masking tool allows you to draw a selection border, including a selection edge, and everything inside the border is masked out from the photo or layer. You can also create a selection using various special brush settings and apply them with the Modify > Select > Inverse menu item. The Lens Correction tool adjusts the color, contrast, and sharpness of an image with the click of a button. The blur tool creates an effect called "blurring," which combines pixel averaging and masking to remove the sharpness from a photo. The Erase tool removes a selected area of an image. The Red-Eye Remover uses sophisticated algorithms to detect and remove red-eye. The tool works best in simple environments. The Liquify tool uses filters to manipulate the appearance of an image, such as changing the size of an object, giving it perspective, or distorting it. It's essential to use a filter carefully to avoid clipping artifacts. The Heal tool helps you fix minor image problems. It can be used to remove scratches, blemishes, and black pixels. The Clone tool allows you to duplicate an image or an object. You can use the tool to remove an unwanted object from an image, to Dental material and devices: analysis of the literature for in vivo research. In vivo research in the field of dentistry is often frustrating. The selection of relevant material or devices for testing in a specific setting is often limited by the lack of suitable, affordable or suitable for clinical research design. This is further limited by the fact that many different dental materials or devices are needed in parallel, but often without proper investigation of these requirements for the performance of the test. This review attempts to reflect the sources of failure for these studies. Data sources were limited to journal literature and were gathered from Medline from 1970 to 1997. A total of 89 papers were found which were either based on in vivo, in vitro or both research. Most (58%) were in vitro, 14% in vivo and 19% in both. Only 8 studies had been conducted in the United States of America. Most reported positive findings, however, 28 (32%) failed due to lack of reproducibility. The reasons for this failure were poor design, missing alternative designs and selective reporting of positive findings. Only a few (12, 13%) studies have been conducted in the United States of America, while most (38, 42%) have been performed elsewhere in the world. Only a few (4, 4%) had been conducted in developing countries. The study of devices and materials remains limited by design, funding and ethics. Design of the experiment must focus more on results, rather than on data collection. Selective reporting, even in positive studies, confounds the scientific process and should be addressed. To be accepted by researchers, in vivo, in vitro and both designs are required in order to evaluate dental materials and devices. Semantic segmentation: Bridging the gap between internal and external memory. Semantic segmentation in the mammalian brain is the process of assigning cognitive (i.e., semantic) meanings to complex object representations. Cognitive maps, or theories of mind, are composed of an internal and external memory. The semantic segmentation process is thought to be based upon multiple interactions of two types, semantic-to-sensory (STS) and sensory-to-semantic (SST), both of which play a central role in memory mapping. STS and SST interactions are essential to the cognitive and mental health and the current evidence suggests that when STS is impaired, SST is not able to compensate. However, the fact that STS and SST interactions cannot be studied in isolation has constrained progress in understanding cognitive and mental health. We propose
