There have been a number of interesting and innovative uses of motion capture data in the past, including the FIFA Street and FIFA 13 franchises. But this is the most complete take on the technology yet, based on live data collected from actual footballers playing games. It also has some other exciting new features. Higher Team Width for More Fan Engagement Team Width, a new feature in the new EA Sports FIFA games, is tuned to have a stronger influence than ever before on the shape of the pitch and how the players move. Team width determines how the team moves in transition, with wider teams potentially creating space in support of the new dribbling tech. From a player's perspective, wider formations will open up more running lanes and more opportunities to pass and shoot. We can expect to see a mix of these new team width settings in FUT and EUW. FUT won't have the unlimited number of formation options in EUW, but it will have more options than in previous FIFA games. We can also expect the vast majority of FUT matches to be played in Full Team Width in either mode, due to FIFA's new emphasis on a match played in a full formation and the need for newer players to learn the new dribbling system. New Fully Realistic Player Dribbling FIFA 22 introduces an adaptive dribbling system. The system adapts to the player's style and positioning and is not an always on or off switch. The new dribbling system uses on-ball physics rather than a predetermined speed, and it makes fewer assumptions about player positioning and balance, allowing the player to move at a natural speed without losing control. It's also designed to take advantage of player speed and acceleration and make better use of the player's body, physics and movement, which is something that other sports have tended to ignore when developing video game dribbling. It works by first using the data collected during the pre-game match simulation to learn the player's individual styles. Based on this data, the ball will move more in a player's direction depending on their style of play. In addition, through motion capture, the player's timing, acceleration, and the consistency of the player's movements will also be used to learn to dribble. The new system also uses player

What's new in Fifa 22:

- FIFA 2122 introduces "HyperMotion Technology" which captures the movements of 22 real-life players and uses the data to help create the most responsive, immersive gameplay of any soccer game in the series. It features new "Contact Camera" technology that captures the positions and movements of the players and showcases them in a way that accurately recreates the on-the-field action. The new Player Trajectory Guide technology displays information about what a player is likely to do on a specific pitch situation, and where the chances of success are greatest.
- The new 'Career Menu' gives players more freedom and customisation to their player creation experience. You can now choose between Standard challenges, which require you to win only a set number of matches to progress to the next level, and Ultimate Challenges, which reward players for completing goals, assists, and tackles that contribute to your team winning matches.
