In an article for the New Statesman, the former prime minister, prime minister and lord chancellor has attacked what he called the "newly fashionable arguments against immigration" made by the Ukip leader Nigel Farage and the Tory leader, David Cameron. Brown, who in 2007 was forced out of Downing Street over immigration after the invasion of Iraq, said: "I hope and expect that in the lifetime of people now alive the great majority of them will at some point in their lives come to live in Britain. "They will do so because we have become one of the great economic powers of the world, because we have a healthy culture and because we want a country where people of diverse backgrounds live side by side with a shared sense of responsibility and endeavour." He warned that "a government with an immigration policy rooted in a Farageish set of arguments, which plays on growing social tensions over who is 'British' and who is not and which relies on policies that have so often turned out to be disastrously wrong-headed, would be a disaster for Britain". In an article for the Guardian last month, Farage declared it was time to "draw a line" on immigrants who "do not want to be 'British'." The Ukip leader had said he wanted more than
