Photoshop CS5 (LifeTime) Activation Code Free

Dear editor {#S0001}

We read with great interest the recent publication by Paria et al[@CIT0001] describing real-time ultrasound-assisted lipectomy, a minimally invasive technique to reduce the circumference of the thigh. We congratulate this multidisciplinary team for their study. We agree with the authors in that ultrasound-assisted lipectomy has not been tried in a published randomized controlled trial yet. Unlike conservative surgery, the ultrasound-assisted lipectomy is a new one, but we believe that the surgeons performing it have gained enough experience to become independent on the technique. In the present study, we would like to share our experience from a single surgeon with this new technique in a randomized controlled trial. Previous publications of ultrasound-assisted liposuction show higher complication rates and less satisfactory aesthetic results.[@CIT0002],[@CIT0003] Moreover, their safety regarding complications, such as nerve and vessel injuries, and their accuracy in determining the correct skin margins, were questioned.[@CIT0004] Ultrasound-assisted lipectomy was originally described for the reduction of circumference of the inner thigh in 18 men and one woman[@CIT0005] in a prospective, single-center study. The mean age of the patients was 48.2 years, which is quite different from that of the patients in the study of Paria et al.[@CIT0001] During ultrasound-assisted lipectomy, the technique is very similar to classical liposuction. The skin is first visualized and marked with a handheld metal probe to guide the cannula in the desired area. Next, the cannula is inserted in a convex shape into the subcutaneous fat layer and then slowly withdrawn to the superficial skin layers, leaving behind an optimal amount of the subcutaneous tissue. According to the results of the study by Paria et al,[@CIT0001] all but one patient had a reduction of approximately 1-2 cm of the inner thigh circumference, and the final results were fairly acceptable. As already mentioned, the technique of ultrasound-assisted liposuction is standardized. However, the definition of the skin margins, the deepest margin of the fat layer, and the skin surface are variable and are frequently a matter of debate. The general surgeon uses experience as well as diagnostic tools to define these parameters. Radiologists have the ability to define skin margins more precisely using ultrasound imaging and 3D

While the majority of the literature states that residents were the most experienced physicians caring for patients with COPD, this study does not support this view. More than three fourths of the residents and around half of the attending physicians had less than five years of experience caring for patients with COPD. This finding could have important implications for education of the medical residents caring for patients with COPD as well as in the continuing education of attending physicians. Residency programs should include regular training on how to care for patients with COPD. The two most commonly used educational methods for patient education were printed materials and verbal information. This finding is in line with a meta-analysis by Gomez and Barreto (2012{ref-type="ref"}) which found that educational materials (printed, audiovisual, Internet and other media) were the most common method of patient education for chronic disease management. In contrast, only 30% of the participants in this study used a direct patient-physician interaction to educate patients about their disease. The frequency of caregivers performing counselling on topics they perceived as important for counselling was not reported. In the quantitative data analysis of this study, we did not differentiate between topics that were actually discussed and topics that were perceived as important. Thus, it was not possible to know the frequency of topics discussed by the caregivers with their patients. While we did not report the educational topics that caregivers addressed with patients, a cross-sectional study conducted in China where a high level of knowledge was reported by physicians in all the topics that they discussed with their patients (Wang et al., 2013{ref-type="ref"}) suggests that an incomplete patient education may not be a major problem in our setting. About half of the family caregivers perceived counselling as an important part of managing COPD and more than three fourths of them wanted their patients to receive more counselling. In addition, almost all the participants perceived that the guideline is important as a reference to provide caregivers of patients with COPD with more counselling. These findings suggest that patients should be provided with
