On December 8, 1944 in Tokyo, after spending the night in a U.S. prison, Kato successfully escaped from his holding at Sugamo. The last U.S. ambassador to Japan, Joseph Grew, and President Harry Truman were unaware of Kato's escape until December 13, when Grew was summoned by Truman, who promptly reprimanded him for not informing him of Kato's arrest. Kato was not captured until December 28, two weeks after the U.S. Occupation of Japan began. The United States Department of Justice initiated a Project OSSI (Office of Strategic Services Interrogation) investigation led by Harold B. Carter to question Kato. Kato was subsequently flown to the Army's interrogation facility at Fort Devens, Massachusetts. Questioning of Kato continued for two and a half years and involved more than 30 interrogators. This project was part of a broader study known as Project Shamrock, which was conducted by four people. The men on that project were Harold B. Carter, a lawyer; James Angleton, the FBI's chief counter-intelligence officer; and Frank Wisner, Chief of Station, OSS, London. During this period, Carter, Angleton and Wisner worked without authority or oversight from the U.S. government. Carter and Angleton failed to inform the FBI of Kato's activities and withheld pertinent information from the U.S. military police conducting the interrogation. The failure to inform the FBI about Kato's activities allowed him to continue to operate and was one of many atrocities committed by the OSSI. The historians who have researched the Project OSSI have established that the information gathered on Kato was an intentional attempt to stir up anti-Japanese sentiment in the United States. Despite this, Kato remains a widely admired person in Japan. www.asr-paperny.ru - The collaborative graphing software Inkscape is based on LibreOffice, which can be used to simultaneously edit and view diagrams, graphs, and maps. A feature that is not available in most other programs is support for interactive 2D and 3D maps. The program can also create presentations and uses text tabs to link various blocks together, such as a block that contains a diagram, map, and narration or a block that contains a list of quotes in the text. In addition, the program is able to import images, videos, and files such as spreadsheets from other programs. The Article, why is the "hut" circle black? The "hut" circle on some elements is black, even though it is not supposed to be. It is black on all "hut" circles, but on some element types (such as the "gbr-room" element, which has no "hut" circle), it is gold. Why is this? A: In the Elements panel, in the lower left corner, the outline color of the active element is changed to black. It's completely random. You can change the color back to the default in the lower right corner of the Elements panel (Ctrl+I to open the panel menu and select "Show default item color") The circled circle is the outline of the element and it can be changed using the Properties dialog (Q to open the panel menu). Magic: The Gathering this weekend? Yup, and it's a Quadruple Homicide. Over at Wizards of the Coast, the company behind Magic: The Gathering has revealed on its website that this weekend's event is called Shadows Over Innistrad. It will happen this weekend on the 18th and 19th. The story plot is that "Mocca, the Vampire Lord, has long hidden among the mortal world. Now, something has driven him out of the shadows, into the light of day, and he is laying claim to Innistrad's secret machinations. He has assembled a cadre of vampires and occultists to go after his target: the Planeswalker, Gideon Jura." Whatever that means. I still haven't managed to get into Shadows over Innistrad because I haven't yet obtained a complete set, but I know that it will be awesome since it's the fourth set in the standard set rotation. I have a feeling this will be the major spoiler event for the set so make sure to wear your non-committal face. I'm curious about what happens between these two events. The most interesting news for this weekend's Magic: The Gathering is that this event will be going on in a Virtual Format. Those of you that have never played a Magic format, it's very similar to the way it works for other video games. Each season you will get points for top players and in the end the player with the most points becomes the champion. In this case the top six players will win
