When you meet Nicola Sacco, don't expect to be the focus. He's too busy chasing terrorists. And, anyway, he's a cautious man. The guy has worked in the Italian intelligence world for years. They've never even told him what they're doing. It turns out that he and his partner, Bartolomeo Vanzetti, are the most wanted men in the world. Sacco (the quiet one) left Italy on the first boat to New York. He's been on the run ever since, carrying his gun without it ever going off. He left behind a wife and four kids. Vanzetti (the loud one) was a loudmouth who campaigned for the anarchists. He spent years in prison, and was shot to death by the Italian police. The group of men who hit the Lindbergh baby are suspected. They were definitely radical, although there is no evidence to link them to the actual culprit. But the link is what Sacco and Vanzetti are after, and what Sacco would die trying to find. There is one real break in the case. We are now offered the chance to clear their names. How could we say no to this offer? It's all so beautiful. The dream of a higher education degree and a traditional job in the medical field is to be lost in the maelstrom of the current health care climate. For a brief time, the demand for healthcare professionals has waned, leaving many taking on second careers in private business. If you think this sounds great, you may be
