A layer is simply a collection of pixels that may have a different color, position, or scale than another layer. So, when you create a new layer, Photoshop adds all of the pixels that make up the object you're creating into a new layer. It is important to note that Photoshop's layers are independent from the original image. This means you can make as many changes to a layer as you would like without altering the original. What We Love Though its more common to call layers "layers," the name "layer" is really a misnomer, as layers are actually independent from the original image. Q: JSF Render Response and PrimeFaces Theme mapping I have a view that I want to map to a PrimeFaces theme. It appears that its possible to override the theme mapping to a subset of PrimeFaces themes and generate a jsf rendered response (with a basic facebox displaying). I've got it working but I'm wondering whether its OK to. Is this a known issue? Is this what I have to do? For example I mapped one of the primefaces themes as follows: #{resource['/public/css/mytheme.css']} #{resource['/public/css/mytheme-overlay.css']} #{resource['/public/css/theme-overlay.css']}
