The Civil War Posted: Sun 3:13 AM, Nov 24, 2008 It was the golden age of the Gilded Age in the United States. The many different forms of wealth made their way into the hands of a few people. When a workman made goods, he didn't own the goods, so he was given the day's wages. If someone bought a finished product, they didn't get all of the profits. The buyer owned only a fraction of the profits of the firm. The really big money came when someone invented something that transformed the way people lived. An industrial innovation made it possible for the people to get food cheaply from the marketplace, make clothes cheaply from locally-grown cotton, and put their home heating, lighting, and cooling where they wanted them. All the different forms of wealth attracted the attention of the robber barons. These powerful industrialists wanted to take control of the new wealth. Some of these industrialists were very good at making money and came from very wealthy families. Some of them were bad men from broken homes or illegitimate births. But all of them wanted their big businesses to be bigger and more profitable. In their quest for more wealth, the robber barons destroyed the lives of many people. This included farmers, laborers, and industrial workers. When the Civil War started, many people thought that the industrialists wanted the war to show that they were right and the farmers were wrong. For the first year or so, the war looked like a battle between the industrialists and the farmers. There were many battles between the industrialists and the farmers. At first, the Union had the support of the farmers. The industrialists claimed that the farmers were pro-slavery. They said the farmers grew the cotton that made the dyes and the machinery to run the factories. All of this support of the Union by the farmers would be a result of not having enough for themselves. The industrialists said that the farmers were happy to work for the wages they were paid by the industrialists because the farmers felt trapped by their land and poverty. The Union was fighting to free the people trapped by their poverty. The Union also had to defeat the southern plantation owners and supporters of the Confederacy. The plantation owners had their own labor force and would not support a rebellion against the North. The Union had two armies. The northern army was led by U.S. President Abraham Lincoln. The southern army was led by the Confederate Vice President Alexander Stephens. The
