“We know footballers move in a specific way, so we created a fluid motion that allows players to behave exactly like themselves,” said Andrew Fitch, FIFA lead gameplay designer. “The game is more intuitive and authentic to give real fans an authentic experience.” The data collected is applied to all in-game player movements and abilities. For example, the ball will react to the movements of players, using specific player animations to make sure the ball reacts naturally. In addition, players’ animations are more realistic, such as when a player comes out of the back for a through ball or when he goes back to defend his penalty area. In some ways, these new real-life animations are almost as good as real player’s movement – it’s that realistic. The latest version of the engine utilises new, real-life movement data, such as a player’s speed and acceleration when they run and their ability to dribble. It also incorporates how the ball will react when it’s under pressure from players. We spoke to EA Sports’ Andrew Fitch to find out more. “The new engine is good for two very specific things. Firstly, we’ve been able to get the ball behaving completely different to how it had been behaving previously, for example, when the ball is under pressure, the player will be able to control it,” said Fitch. “Secondly, we’ve been able to make player stats more accurate, for example how closely a shot is going to go in or how often they are able to beat their man.” What’s different? “We have been able to refine the way players behave on and off the ball and how the ball behaves around each player,” said Fitch. “Previously, when the ball was under pressure there weren’t necessarily player animations to show what a player was going to do. We wanted to be able to show that when a player goes into a challenge, he can go to the ball and get it out of trouble. “We wanted to show player movement and a player will now almost look like they are gliding across the pitch, rather than needing to step and then go into a tackle. When a player is going to be able to control the ball, we will say that they will be able to control the
