Inhibition of tumor growth in vivo by a novel recombinant adenovirus encoding single-chain urokinase-type plasminogen activator. The recombinant adenovirus encoding single-chain urokinase-type plasminogen activator (scuPA) was constructed with a deletion of two amino acids in the urokinase domain and substitution of the scuPA transmembrane and signal sequences for the sequence of HIV tat, to enhance its expression. Tumor cells infected with the recombinant adenovirus were strongly inhibited in in vitro proliferation and in vivo tumor growth. The

An effective disease-management strategy is to improve the quality of seedlings by inoculating them with a partial coat protein (P1) during seeding in orchards. The seeds of watermelon (Citrullus lanatus [Thunb.] Matsum & Nakai) are treated by soaking them in an aqueous extract from a cell suspension culture of F. oxysporum f.sp. melonis. The horticultural treatment improves the quality of the seeds, but this improvement is often not adequate to ensure the germination of most seedling production. However, the seedlings from these improved seeds show adequate resistance to the pathogen. In this study, we conducted a greenhouse experiment to evaluate the effectiveness of P1 protein against F. oxysporum f.sp. melonis. Plants were treated by soaking seeds in a partial coat protein extract (P1) and exposed to the pathogen. At 12 and 20 days after sowing, the germination percentage, total leaf area, fresh weight, and P1 protein content were lower for P1-treated plants compared with controls. In addition, the number of F. oxysporum f.sp. melonis conidia was higher on both roots and leaves of P1-treated plants than on the roots and leaves
