Dear Editor: We would like to provide a brief overview of the Virology Society of Australia and New Zealand (VSA) in relation to the current COVID-19 outbreak. This paper aims to help inform the wider community of the role VSA has played and is playing in supporting regional virology laboratories in these challenging times. VSA started as a non-motorised society in 1991 and became a founding member of the Australasian Society for Clinical Virology (ASCV) in 2003. In 2015, the VSA Annual Conference attracted 410 attendees, and at this time, VSA had 28 branches across Australia and New Zealand. VSA groups also run some community services. For example, a subsidiary of VSA, Australia's VFV, organises biannual meetings in the Northern Territory, where approximately 30 virologists and virology laboratory scientists come together from across Australia, New Zealand, and the Northern Territory for both practical and social activities. The importance of regional virology laboratories working together can be seen during this current outbreak with the centralised location of COVID-19 in Wuhan, China. Around 1 month before the first case of severe acute respiratory syndrome coronavirus 2 (SARS-CoV-2) was reported, virologists had begun to recognise the commonalities of a new SARS-CoV-2 strain.
