BlueSky Software. Isis Draw is a cartoonish .Q: Which methods are more efficient for obtaining the X and Y coordinates of an image view? I am writing an image view that will zoom (i.e. zoom to a larger-scale image within an existing UIImageView). I'm not entirely sure whether obtaining the image's position, x-y coordinate values would be more efficient than having the image scaled and then calculating the x and y values. Which approach would be more efficient, and what are the underlying issues? A: The idea is not the absolute position that is more efficient, but the scaling factor (relative to another reference). If you calculate the position of your image in iOS you have to use `(image.image.size.width, image.image.size.height)`, where image is a UIImageView or an UIView. With those values you can calculate the (absolute or relative to the imageView) position of the image. The scaling factor is $(\text{image.image.size.width, image.image.size.height}) / (\text{reference.frame.size.width, reference.frame.size.height})$. Since all the values are relative to the imageView, the position and the scaling factor will be the same, but when the imageView size is changed, the original image.image.size values will change. If you use the scaling factor to calculate the absolute position of the image, the position will be changed when the imageView is resized. If you have the x/y positions of the image you will need to make an image copy (new UIImage(reference.size).image) to calculate the positions for the scaled image. For the absolute position, you can use an object with 2 IBOutlet: @property (nonatomic
