One doesn't need to be an archaeologist to realize that, despite the widespread use of digital photography as a way to record archaeological sites, the process of obtaining and presenting archaeological images is still quite flawed. Most of the post-processed images of archaeological sites are created from digital photographs and may include a variety of digital alteration. For example, if one were to photograph a site and then later edit the image to account for the movement of clouds, it is this edited version of the image that would be considered an archaeological image. But how can we even know that a digital image has archaeological value? Since when did this become the necessary requirement of archaeological images? This is what the Center for the Study of Visual Culture is proposing to do with a new exhibition, Archaeology in New Media: Photographs, Paintings, and Modeling, which will be opening in January, 2015 at the First Unitarian Society in New York City, titled "Room 305." The exhibition will present examples of "archaeological images," ranging from one of the earliest images of human behavior to photographs of what appear to be images of a spaceship, and from the 1920s to the present day. Unfortunately, the title of the show is rather misleading. The real question is: How do we know if an image qualifies as being archaeological or not? Which images are considered to be real archaeological images and which are not? Fortunately, there has been some development in this area over the past few years that makes it possible to answer this question. The History of Archaeological Image Research (HAIR) project was one of the first to attempt to establish criteria for determining what counts as an archaeological image. Its conclusion was that we need a "reliable method to objectively identify the archaeological and non-archaeological images in archival collections." In order to develop this "reliable method," the HAIR project asked archivists around the world to provide real-world examples of archaeological and non-archaeological images. Subsequently, a team led by Christopher Goffard, Kevin Gentry, Nathan J. Enns, and Richard A. Frock compiled and analyzed the real-world data submitted by the archivists in order to develop a database of 106 examples of archaeological images. After evaluating the database, Frock et al. developed what they believe to be the best criteria for determining what qualifies as an archaeological image. As summarized by the archaeologists, the criteria are: Manipulated in the laboratory or to be a lot of "yes" votes, who are actually supporting the idea of a substantive face-to-face exchange of views before going into the countdown to the final vote. But in this instance, it's not a question of whether a ballot can be cast in writing, or by post, or in a closed session, or on a website – it is a question of whether the final three hours are for pre-vote debate or a one-sided slugfest. Tuesday, August 08, 2010 So I have been following the account of the conversation between Boris Johnson and David Cameron, in their meeting in Westminster. I'm not going to replicate their arguments here (they have their own blog). This is where I have an interest, though. In the earlier post, this, I quoted a tweet from Lord Ashcroft, who was in the room, about David Cameron's conduct during the meeting. He took issue with Cameron's failure to point out that the proposal for a face-to-face had been put on the back-burner, with no specific commitment to meet again. I think there are two points here. First, Ashcroft seems to be wrong, if only because the draft plan that is being proposed by the Lib Dems is that Boris Johnson talks to David Cameron in public, and of course everyone knows that Boris Johnson has no objection to doing that. Second, I think Ashcroft is wrong to suggest that this was an important point. If this was a critical moment in the coalition, when we were going to break up unless we found a way of avoiding the descent to electoral oblivion, or a way of showing we were working together, and Cameron made a mistake that mattered, there is something going on that has not been apparent in the past. But if that was the case, we already knew that Boris Johnson and David Cameron don't get on. Cameron appears to be falling into a pattern, where he makes a major speech, and commits the government to something, and then rejects it afterwards. It's easy to accuse him of opportunism, but most of us were cynical about Labour's policy on tuition fees at the time – it would be a fool to say that the government was wrong to say that they would regard it as a priority, and then look as though they would not deliver on it if they gained power. (Though I'm sure the Conservatives
