It’s because I believe we’re on the brink of something big. Let me explain, and I can do so with confidence because we have had a number of conversations over the last several months about how we are going to create a movement to wake people up to the realities of our environmental crisis, and how a core of passionate, creative people working together can create a new international political party with the potential to take power. You may be wondering where this is coming from. How can the founder of one of the most influential blogs in the world, who has been featured in mainstream media outlets like the New York Times and Washington Post, have run out of ideas? Maybe I am talking about a solution to a problem that does not exist. There is quite a bit of skepticism, even among my closest friends, when I express my growing confidence. But I want to lay out some core facts that I have come to believe in, and I want to have conversations about how we move beyond the status quo. The first thing I want to talk about is that I believe it is inevitable that a major political party in the United States will be formed by activists and committed progressives. I can only begin to imagine the disruptions we will experience. When people learn that a movement for large-scale, long-term, systemic change exists, a lot of the instinct is to go for the relatively safe, low-hanging fruit. Let’s say that an environmental activist decides to storm a restaurant at a local mall. As bad as that might be for the restaurant, it doesn’t have the potential to foment a massive social movement to transform the entire food system, so it goes largely unnoticed. As a result, we are forced to either live in the same ways or live in a country where the growth of the economy is compromised to the point where it is barely sustainable. We will
