But I'm not so sure if it's the right thing to do. I see no problem with that. I see it as positive, because it enables low-rep users to get a head start and be recognized for their good work. I see no way to do harm, but there is a small possibility that people don't wish to be helped by a low-rep user and then that leaves a bitter taste. So I'm not sure this is a good idea. A: I disagree. The goal should be quality, not quantity. Anyone can write a correct program. The key is writing one that is useful to others. Some users get particularly good at that, and are indeed able to give consistently high-quality answers. But merely having good answers is not the point of a Q&A site like this. I already have a reputation high enough that I should not be concerned that I might be promoted to moderator. But I don't promote others to moderator with even higher rep, because a moderator is not someone just anyone can be. Instead, I take a much longer-term view and work to gain privileges more slowly. I work to earn my reputation. If there are users with low reputation with high-quality answers, then by all means, give them a job. But we should always be
