The present invention relates generally to electrical contactors and, more particularly, to spring and movable contact elements. An electrical contactor is a switch that is designed to make and break an electrical connection in response to physical and/or electrical stimuli. The contactor typically is provided with two movable contact elements, each of which is connected to an actuation member in such a way that, in the actuated state, both contact elements are brought together to complete the circuit, and, in the unactuated state, both contact elements are spaced apart, thereby creating an open circuit. The contact elements are mounted on one or more moveable core members that are electrically insulated from one another. An electromagnetic assembly may be provided for actuating the core members. In particular, as the core members are moved by the electromagnetic assembly, the contact elements are moved to change the state of the contactor. FIG. 1 schematically illustrates an exemplary contactor 100 that is made up of an arrangement of electrical conductors 102, an electromagnetic assembly comprising an electromagnetic coil 104 having a movable core 106 and a fixed core 108, and contact elements 110 and 112, which are electrically connected to the contactors conductors 102. The movable core 106 is supported by and attached to a linear actuation member 114 and the fixed core 108 is supported by and attached to a second linear actuation member 116. The actuation members 114 and 116 are substantially parallel with one another. The contactor 100 is designed to be used with a solenoid-actuated switchgear. The fixed core 108 and movable core 106 are coupled in such a way that, when the movable core 106 is actuated, it draws or repels the fixed core 108, causing it to move and thus bring the contact elements 110 and 112 together and create the electrical contact. If the movable core 106 is then de-actuated, it will return to its former position and the contact elements 110 and 112 will separate. To achieve the isolation of the movable core 106 and fixed core 108 from one another, they may be surrounded by an insulating material, e.g., glass. To prevent the flow of oil between the movable core 106 and fixed core 108, they are sometimes fitted with oil barriers that are also made of an insulating material. The movable core 106 may be made of steel, iron or another ferromagnetic material having magnetic properties, while the fixed core 108 may be made of an inert non-ferrom

A randomized, double-blind, parallel group comparison of rosuvastatin with atorvastatin for the primary prevention of coronary heart disease. Although statins are the most effective drugs for primary and secondary prevention of cardiovascular disease, their individual impact, benefits, and safety in clinical practice are not fully understood. We compared the efficacy and safety of atorvastatin with rosuvastatin in patients at risk of coronary heart disease (CHD). In a prospective, double-blind, randomized study of 12,239 patients with established CHD and high low-density lipoprotein cholesterol levels, we assigned 2112 patients to rosuvastatin (n=1056), 10 mg daily, and 1156 patients to atorvastatin (n=575), 10 mg daily. The treatments were both well tolerated, but we observed an increased risk of new-onset diabetes in patients treated with atorvastatin. There were no significant differences between the groups with regard to myalgias or between the groups at baseline with regard to clinical characteristics, lipid levels, or other cardiovascular risk factors. The main outcome measure was the development of a second CHD event, including coronary artery bypass grafting or percutaneous coronary intervention. Although there was an overall trend toward lower risk with rosuvastatin, the difference between the two treatments was not significant (18.5% versus 19.5%; hazard ratio [HR], 0.96; 95% confidence interval [CI], 0.88 to 1.04; P=0.4). The effect of rosuvastatin was more marked in patients with atherosclerotic CHD (HR, 0.80; 95% CI, 0.73 to 0.88; P
