Central nervous system (CNS) structural and functional abnormalities may represent a pivotal mechanism in the pathogenesis of essential headache. This article reviews recent literature on CNS abnormalities associated with the headache of the primary headache syndromes. Recent neuroimaging studies have demonstrated that abnormalities of regional cerebral blood flow (rCBF) and white matter hyperintensities (WMH) are associated with the occurrence of migraine and cluster headache. The large WMH observed on magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) and computed tomography of the brain are thought to be caused by chronic cerebral hypoperfusion. Recent findings suggest that the neurochemical abnormalities of migraine, cluster headache, and medication overuse headache are correlated with rCBF changes. Some studies have shown that patients with chronic tension-type headache have higher numbers of positive pressure sites compared with controls. Increased brain activity in the pain-related area and high pain sensitivity may develop in patients with migraine and cluster headache due to neurochemical changes. Migraine attacks are associated with an increase in periaqueductal gray matter activity. Recent studies have revealed consistent white matter abnormalities in patients with migraine and cluster headache. These abnormalities may be related to the risk of recurrence. Recent imaging studies provide evidence for cortical abnormalities in patients with essential headache. In particular, reduced functional brain activity in the pain-related area and high pain sensitivity may develop in patients with migraine and cluster headache. Cannabidiol for epilepsy - what is the evidence? Cannabidiol (CBD) is a naturally occurring cannabinoid, which to date has received little attention in epilepsy research. We systematically review the existing evidence on the antiepileptogenic effect of CBD.

We review the preclinical studies on the antiepileptogenic effect of CBD and its mechanism of action. Moreover, we assess the results of randomized clinical trials with CBD as adjunctive therapy in adults and children with epilepsy. The available preclinical data indicate antiepileptogenic properties of CBD, as well as its neuroprotective and anti-inflammatory properties.
